I feel that this case is unjust. Innovation is being hurt by these litigations. It appears that people just want to take all of Microsoft's war chest that allows it to continue to innovate even more. What will happen if we have no Microsoft. Will innovation continue. Microsoft has been a leading edge in the last few years.

I was a Netscape user I paid for my copy of Netscape in spite of the free Internet explorer. I supported the company I respected. Until they provided a poor product during several upgrades. Each time I loaded the latest and greatest it had even more problems than the previous product. When that took place the third time I stopped using it. A company has to earn my money. They need to innovate. I had so many crashes and problems with Netscape I said enough is enough. No matter how good they said they were if it doesn't work it is not worth having or paying for. It was the innovation and the improvements that made the difference not the cost. I want something that works not something that was hit and miss.

I have used a large number of Word Processors in my time. I was a big fan of Word Perfect but again innovation started to disappear from the product. I also owned the complete Word Perfect Suite. I paid for a quality product. At that time Word Perfect was the innovator that Microsoft had to compete against. In the early years no one could touch Word Perfect Office. Now I can't compare the two. Microsoft has developed a better Office suite. Now Microsoft Office meets my needs. Word Perfect is still dear to my heart but again innovation is what has won out. I will stay with a company only so long. Today It is Microsoft Office. Tomorrow who knows but it had better be a better product than what Microsoft has developed. Innovation again wins out. It was the way the companies see about developing their products. Yes Microsoft was aggressive but is it not true in any business. You find where you are lacking and improve the weakness and innovate.

Today Microsoft is the Leader. They are looking ahead. While the competition should be improving their own products they spend money and political favors to try to prevent the next series of innovations from taking place. Is it the interest of the public to prevent a better product from being developed because those who don't want to innovate feel they are being cheated? Are we to provide poor quality items instead of excellent ones? Where is the public interest in that? What is happening behind the scenes? I see congressman trying to destroy Microsoft in favor of companies in their own states.

I believe it is in the best interest to get this court case over with. Enough is enough. Resources that could provide a better product for Microsoft Users is being hindered and given to lawyers. The only winners here are the lawyers, a few non innovating companies, and the states but not the public. Every one wants something. There are a number of companies out in the market who practice even worse monopoly powers. They just don't have the exposure. This case has hurt the Tech sector of the economy. It still provides a drag with no end in sight. In a middle of a recession and still the good of Microsoft and its present day accomplishments are demonized because of what happened years ago.

Sincerely yours.
